A LAST WORD ON THE OFFERTORY

I have heard in many different places around the country that some people are really disturbed at the practice of having everyone who is to receive communion place an altar-bread in a ciborium on his way into church to take part in the Mass. Isn't sanitary, they say, to have to receive in communion an altar-bread that somebody else has touched with possibly not - too-clean fingers.

This difficulty reminds me of a cartoon that appeared in the New Yorker once, depicting the vicissitudes (including being dropped in the muddy street) which a loaf of French bread had undergone from the time it was taken out of the oven in the bakery until it was brought in on a silver salver covered with a spotless white napkin and placed on the table of an expensive restaurant. If we begin to think about all the possible hazards involved in eating anything except what we have personally cooked and served, we should certainly be reduced to a limited and strictly home cooked diet.

However, where this practice really disturbs people, it would seem possible to overcome the difficulty by the simple expedient of providing tongs, like the ones used for lump sugar or small ice cubes. For this gesture of deliberately placing an altar bread in the ciborium, which will, at the offertory, be brought up with the wine to the altar in some kind of procession, does seem helpful to full participation in the Mass in various ways.

For one thing, it gives us a chance to see the altar-breads and so to be reminded - especially if they are of the substantial and bready variety now being used in more and more churches -- of what this offering of bread means.

Again, when the ciboria filled with the altar-breads are brought up to the altar in procession, we can see that these gifts, this food for our bodies which is to become the bread of life, come from us. They do not appear on the altar from nowhere, they come from us; they have been provided by us. We have identified ourselves with them as they are placed on the altar to become the body of Christ. There the priest receives them and asks, in the prayer over the gifts, that God will accept them and sanctify both them and us through the holy sacrifice.

Thirdly, this placing of an altar-bread in a ciborium by each person who intends to receive communion might help to make it clearer to those who do not yet realize it that one does not fully take part in the Mass unless one receives communion -- a fact noted both in the 1958 Instruction on the Liturgy and in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy.

And, finally, this practice might encourage priests to do what is urged in the Constitution, to make it possible for the faithful to receive hosts that have been consecrated at the Mass they are attending, and not at some previous sacrifice. After all, when you take part in a meal and your food has to be brought, as a kind of after-thought, from a refrigerator or a cupboard, you can't help feeling that you weren't really expected, that giving you food was not an integral part of the meal as it was planned. In the same way at Mass, when the celebrant, having eaten the bread and drunk the cup that are on the holy table has to go and unlock the tabernacle to give the faithful their share of the bread of heaven, it doesn't look as though their participation in the Lord's supper was really planned for; it makes it look like a kind of "extra." The main problem seems to be that of calculating how many altar-breads to consecrate at each Mass; if each person intending to receive communion placed an altar-bread in the ciborium when going into Mass, the difficulty would seem to be solved. So let us hope that this practice spreads -- with the use of tongs if necessary to make it acceptable. (Mary Perkins Ryan, from Has the New Liturgy Changed You?)

WE HATE TO SEE YOU GO... Parochial life here at SS. Peter and Paul's has been greatly enhanced by the presence and work of the three seminarians. Now their departures are approaching and we will really miss them. Bro. Pat Lynch will leave next Sat. Aug. 17, to begin his retreat for final vows. Bro. Bill Rolston will leave not long after to take up his teaching post at one of the Sacred Hearts Fathers' high schools in Calif. And Bro. Jim Nickel will leave at the end of the month to return to the seminary in New Hampshire. We are all very grateful for their inspiring work, and our prayers go with them as they continue their way toward the priesthood.
